'Song of the Open Road' is separated into four separate stanzas. With the exception of the first stanza, which contains only three lines, the other stanzas contain four lines of verse. The poem utilizes free verse; the lines are unrhymed and of varying lengths. Song of the Open Road is told from the first-person point of view, and the speaker, perhaps Whitman, knows himself very well. Whitman is often referred to today as the "father of free verse poetry".

Leaves of Grass, V: Song of the Open Road pours with a deep garnet color before crowning with a dense sepia creme. Its spicy scent doesn't just stop at the potpourri of Christmas-type spices, its shares a woody, grassy, peppery and citrusy hop kick. Its generous sweetness is a mix of brown sugar, sorghum, caramel and toast.
